MANUSCRIPT DETAILS

TITLE: Sustainable Building Design for Archival Storage Facilities in Asian Warm and Humid Climates

ABSTRACT: This study outlines a design for archival storage facilities in the warm and humid climate. Both the temperature and humidity conditions present challenges to provide storage for and access to rare materials in a safe manner that prevents their deterioration. The design considers site sustainability, design modification, water efficiency, energy efficiency, indoor environment, and lifecycle cost analysis. Building orientation and façade selection are also optimized to minimize the building's cooling load, calculated to be 80 tons, with five different cooling zones corresponding to each requirement. The main building's primary cooling system would be a chiller system with thermal ice storage for cost-saving via reduced electricity consumption. Water use would be minimized by collecting rainwater for indoor use. Photovoltaic (PV) panels would be used as additional electricity sources to reduce carbon footprint and lower utility costs from electricity consumption of the building. The sustainable building design demonstrates potential lifecycle cost savings of 31% from the baseline case and compliance with the Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design (LEED) platinum rating.

The journal has a "double blind" review process; The reviewers' name will remain anonymous while the authors' name of the paper will remain anonymous to reviewers.
